The positive and negative aspects of globalization have been extensively studied by various scholars. Some researchers consider globalization a natural process of global development, while others view it as a threat to national culture and traditions. Thus, forming the idea of national patriotism in the context of globalization has become an urgent issue.

In Uzbekistan, several state programs have been implemented to promote and instill national patriotism among young people. In particular, the 'Youth is Our Future' state program, the 'National Idea' subject, and other social initiatives play a significant role in this regard. These programs aim to preserve national identity among young people, promote historical heritage, and foster a sense of responsibility for the country's development.

Moreover, the development of modern information technologies significantly influences the worldview of young people. The impact of global trends and different cultures is becoming stronger through social media and mass media. Therefore, educational institutions and public organizations need to enhance their efforts in promoting national values and encouraging youth to remain loyal to their cultural heritage.

The formation of national patriotism in the era of globalization contributes to increasing social activity among young people, strengthening their respect for cultural heritage, and motivating them to contribute to the country's development. In this regard, the role of the education system, mass media, and family is crucial. Educating future generations with respect for national values is one of the key factors in ensuring national stability.

In the context of globalization, fostering national patriotism among young people remains a relevant and necessary issue. Through state policies, the education system, and collective efforts of society, it is possible to preserve national values and educate future generations in the spirit of patriotism. This, in turn, directly impacts the stability and development of the country.
