Introduction: If all human beings save new-born infants vanished to another planet, and if by a miracle the babies were kept alive for a score of years, preserving whatever knowledge and skills came from natural inner growth, and lacking only the influence of the educational activities of other men, they would, at the age of twenty-one, be a hard of animals. They would get a precarious living from fruits, berries and small animals, would easily become victims of malaria, yellow fever, small-pox and plague and would know little more of language, mechanic arts or provision for the future than the monkeys. They would be distinguishable from the other mammalian species chiefly by a much greater variety of bodily movements, especially of the hands, mouth parts and face, a much quicker rate of learning, and a very much keener satisfaction in mental life for its own sake. They would consequently enjoy the remnants of sivilization, using the books, tools, engines and the like as toys, somewhat more intelligently than would apes, but they would not read the books, repair the tools or make of the engines more than spectacles for amusement, wonder and fear.
